

How Caste System protected Hindu Society from Degeneration until Christian British arrived on the scene

The People

2010 Jan 1 IST 11 AM

Broadly speaking we have three types of people

1. Those whose learning process ends at completion of their basic formal education. Hereafter all they learn is largely based on what they read in newspapers, magazines, television news and serials, cinema, etc.
2. Those whose learning process continues well after basic formal education. Here they learn new things by pursuing higher education which hardly helps humanity because they either engage themselves in pursuit of inventions leading to destruction of humanity or in pursuits of somehow managing to drag humanity out of the destruction caused by others. Those who argue that today we can reach Africa flying within hours forget that majority of those who land there do so driven by self-interest which mostly conflict with core interests of the natives. And others who argue that medical sciences have great achievements to their credit easily forget that people lived much-more healthier earlier than they do now. The learned of today seem to live under the illusion that their ongoing fire-fighting pursuits can hardly be termed as 'true' contribution towards humanity.
3. Those who truly contribute something original towards humanity.

Today's world is ruled by the second category, be that the field of education, medicine, scientific inventions, literary contributions, governance and administration of the society and the nation. It is they who define humanity in today's context.

Now this second category happens to be populated with people belonging to various denominations, for instance, atheists, agnostics, evolutionists, Marxists, or even followers of prophetic religions. These people generally have very confused understanding of how the Creator of this Universe manages this Universe. They tend to float their own hypothesis as to how things happen. Those utopian theories have hardly any substance in them except that they are convincingly worded. This way one illusion leads to another and the process goes on.

Incomplete